Whenever you regard teachers as a group, you always find a small subset who just seem to have a natural gift for their life's work. Professionals who understand and embrace both the science and the art of their profession, they work tirelessly to hone their craft. And within that small group are a few educators who can share their insight with clarity, brevity, and truth. Michael Linsin is, without a doubt, one of those rare individuals.

I don't have time for complex behavior systems or materialistic incentive programs that quite frankly don't always work.
